I just finished the section about private methods that return null. I am confused about the following sentence: We should avoid even the possibility of throwing exceptions from a private method. In some cases we can't avoid it; for example, the only way to signal that an exception was thrown in a private method is to throw it from the private method itself. But if the only way to signal an exception is through its own interface, then there is no need to define that interface; we can simply declare a private method that throws an exception. The main reason I am confused is because I can't see how to check for a null return value. Suppose we have the following class: `public class SomeClass { private String doSomething() { String a = null; try { a = getTheStringFromSomewhere(); } catch (NullPointerException e) { //throw exception } //null return a; } public String getTheStringFromSomewhere() { //return string } }` So why are we saying that we shouldn't even check for a null return value? A: If a method returns a value which may be null, and throws an exception, then you have to know whether the method threw an exception in the calling code. You can't know without actually calling the method. The alternative is to wrap the code in a method, so you don't have to do the null check in the calling code: `public class SomeClass { private String doSomething() { try { String a = getTheStringFromSomewhere();`
