Antenatal and postnatal ultrasound diagnosis of central nervous system anomalies: a study of nine-hundred and eighty-nine children. The antenatal and postnatal diagnosis of central nervous system anomalies was performed on 989 children. Mean age was 10.7 +/- 10.7 days. All were referred for ultrasound follow-up because of either a suspected central nervous system malformation or a fetal congenital anomaly. Associated anomalies, postnatal diagnosis and postnatal management were recorded.

The most common finding was a brain malformation. In 38% of the infants, a central nervous system malformation was found only at postnatal ultrasound. Most of the diagnoses were made in the first week of life (90%). In 12% of the cases, an early diagnosis was established. In 55% of the infants, it was possible to establish a diagnosis based on prenatal ultrasound. Associated malformations were diagnosed in 26% of the fetuses. The main risk factor was structural and genetic anomalies. The immediate management of all central nervous system malformations included referral to a neurosurgical centre and monitoring of the central nervous system functions. The prognosis was related to the severity of the malformation.// //
