(PTC) today announced that a clinical study conducted for Eli Lilly and Company has been published in the New England Journal of Medicine, which demonstrates the performance of a newly developed point of care (POC) assay used in conjunction with the Eli Lilly CardioMetics™ BNP System to rapidly and accurately rule-in acute and chronic heart failure. This company-sponsored study is the first randomized, controlled comparison of a POC BNP test with a standard laboratory BNP assay, and demonstrates that the use of the POC assay is capable of identifying patients with both acute and chronic heart failure. "This study is significant because it establishes the clinical utility of a novel POC assay for BNP in the diagnosis of acute and chronic heart failure, and supports the test's potential as a useful diagnostic strategy to deliver the appropriate management to patients suffering from this debilitating disease," stated David R. Webster, M.D., Senior Vice President of Cardiovascular Research and Development, Eli Lilly and Company. "More importantly, it also demonstrates the effective integration of a novel and diverse diagnostic strategy into clinical practice across multiple points of care." The trial is the first and largest randomized, controlled trial of a POC test to rule-in both acute and chronic heart failure. It was conducted on a large population of heart failure patients at
