"It's all about simplicity and speed," says founding engineer Janick Girardin. Janick Girardin is no ordinary engineer. As the founding engineer of Hello Todo, he has quietly helped shape the first major client for Google's new app, "Hey Google," by serving as a key contributor to the app's unique and rather quirky design. "It's all about simplicity and speed," says Girardin in an interview with The Next Web. "The less we add, the better. We have some of the most focused people in the Google app team working on Hey Google, and that's the project I worked on from the start." Here's what Girardin says it's all about, in his own words: "Hey Google" was announced in September as Google's new personal assistant application. It's the second major Google app update of the year, after the company announced it was shutting down its ToDo app, and it's a first for Google's App Maker tool, which was initially intended for use by designers. For the first time, the App Maker tool was made available to developers as a way to create a new service for Google Now. In the years since Google's ToDo was born, a lot has happened: the introduction of Google Now, a battery of updates, and new features. In just a few short years, Google Now has become Google's most used app on Android and iOS. That means a lot of smart people are working on what will surely become the next great smart assistant on Android and iOS. We're excited to see where this new project takes us
