Elements uses a different method for image editing. Unlike Photoshop's layers, the Elements program uses something called "image masks" for editing. Image masks let you draw around an area and cut out portions of an image and isolate them as a separate layer. You can even apply special effects to a masked area, such as increasing the brightness of a shadowed area. Here is a brief description of how an image mask works: * You create the image mask. The first thing you do in this process is create a new layer. Then, you draw around the area you want to mask on the new layer. * You place the image on top of the masked area. The image you want to create the mask for needs to go on top of the area you've masked. * You "alt" or "drag" the layer down to a new layer below the masked layer. The layer below the masked layer is a duplicate of the masked layer. Elements enables you to create and place multiple layers that operate as individual masks so you can create several layers of effects that you then apply to multiple images. * You remove the "alt" or layer. If you want to remove the layer, just use the Eraser tool to erase it. * You make the image changes. In Photoshop, you can use any tool to alter the layer mask. However, Elements is a little less flexible. Instead, you can use filters to apply special effects to the masked area. Although Photoshop is the more professional of the two, Elements can be an extremely powerful tool if you know how to use it effectively. ## About Color Like the names of food products, the names of colors have a long tradition. For example, we say that the color "red" is "royal" because it's the color of royalty. In addition, colors can have special meanings, based on the color wheel and color theory. For example, the color "purple" symbolizes royalty because of its closeness to the royal color "indigo." See the color wheel on the next page for more information on color theory and color wheel (and click the banner for more resources on the color wheel). ## Color Wheels Color wheels (shown in Figure 2-1) are an easy and effective way to quickly select a color for an image. In fact, many of the tools you use to create images, including Photoshop's tools this, he set out, together with J. T. Booth and J. W. Williamson, upon a tour of inspection around the plantations, in order to familiarize themselves with the country and to obtain information for a map and plans. After a stay of two months in Washington, a contract was executed for the first section of the line, for a distance of from Grayson County to Grayson. After concluding this survey, the trio proceeded to the end of their expedition in Virginia, receiving the necessary ordinances to take possession of the land, and a certificate from the President of the United States. Upon returning to Washington on March 1, 1862, he was assigned to other surveys of the various departments, and afterwards became connected with the U.S. Geological Survey, entering into the work on the western branch of the survey, and afterward on the comprehensive line. With the passage of the General Appropriations Bill in 1862, Williamson was commissioned to survey the eastern portion of the border line from Virginia to the western base of the Rocky Mountains, and on July 31, 1863, completed his report. This gave the true latitude and longitude of every part of the boundary. He was then transferred to the United States Geological Survey, to continue the survey westward from the 103rd meridian of longitude. He continued at work upon this work until his death at Washington on May 20, 1877. In conjunction with his work of exploration, he published a series of maps and notes on the topography of his explorations. John Wesley Powell was an early polymathic American scientist, geographer, ethnologist, biologist, linguist, pioneer ethnologist of Native American languages, and pioneer ethnologist of North America. Most of his scientific work was done as a geologist at a time when few geologists were engaged in scientific research (Smithsonian Institution 1884). John Wesley Powell, who is best known for his exploration of the Colorado River system in the southwestern United States and northern Mexico, was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on January 19, 1834. His parents moved to a farm near Darlington, Pennsylvania, when he was three years old. His education was completed in the district schools of Darlington. He began studies at the University of Pennsylvania in 1847 and graduated in 1851. John W. Powell, the zoologist, was the son of a gentleman of Philadelphia and of a lady who had extensive interests in social and scientific circles. He studied classics at the University of Pennsylvania, graduating in 1852. At
