And the risks of a divided Korean Peninsula are at their highest in decades. There are many factors prompting Pyongyang to test the fuse of peace. One possibility is that Kim has concluded that he can get away with it. Another possibility is that he is prepared to pay a steep price for the sake of preserving his regime. Tensions are again soaring in the Korean Peninsula, and the current politics makes the most dangerous scenario possible. Tensions along the Sino-Japanese boundary are also likely to rise as China increases its activity along the disputed border with Japan. South Korea has said it would be extremely difficult to resolve Sino-Japanese territorial disputes without resolving the North-South Korean differences. Seoul also wants to begin to resolve the disputes with Tokyo, which seek to deal with the legacy of World War II. If the region enters into another period of high tensions, the U.S. military will have to quickly decide whether to adapt its policies, strategies, and plans in anticipation of a potential North Korean attack, and whether to provide any assistance to the South Korean military, in the absence of U.S. support. Despite the potential for danger and interest, the meeting is but one of many such missions. On 18 June, after the failure of India and Pakistan to negotiate a permanent ceasefire in Kashmir, Chinese Ambassador to India, Wu Dawei, said in a statement that China's state counselors had advised Indian representatives that the best solution was to find a political solution through dialogue and not escalate tensions. 5ec8ef588b
